"SEEING SAN MARINO"

T-1343

Burton Holmes

All Americans will be most interested to go with Burton Holmes sight seeing in a country that has two presidents at the same time and changes them twice a year - with a one-term platform - or in four years sixteen presidents to our one - such is the government executive office of the Republic of San Marino, and imagine selecting them by lottery from the legislative body or congress - that's how the Sammarinesi select their chief executives called Captani Reggenti.

"SEEING SAN MARINO" is a rather unusual photo-journey off the beaten track with Burton Holmes to the Republic of San Marino the smallest and oldest of Nations having a Republican form of a Government. Located in the mountains of Italy and occupying a mere pin point on the map of Europe, the entire republic covers less than thirty-eight square miles and has a population of little over twelve thousand souls.

We see a folk whose motto is "Libertas" and whose republican ideals date back to the opening decade of the fourth century when a Dalmatian monk climbed the heights of Mt. Titanus and there upon this mountain of mythological fame - established a free republic which has maintained its independence, its ideals of liberty, in the midsts of strife and blood shed of wars and of changing social conditions, throughout the centuries that have followed.

This easy chair journey is in reality a dip into medieval history for few places on earth have retained their medieval atmosphere as effectually as San Marino, and the spirit of primitive times, developed into picturesque customs during the middle ages, is the chief attraction of San Marino today.

A most unusual travel-picture that was difficult to obtain because Burton Holmes had to journey a long way to San Marino to bring San Marino to you. Every exhibitor should book this release for the principles of liberty, free society, justice, and peace represented by the sturdy, wholesome people of the Republic of San Marino.
